University of Sussex Special Collections (UK). Archive of Mass Observation, 1937-1967.

The Archive of Mass Observation, which is held at the University of Sussex, is an excellent resource for any historian researching British grassroots history during the 20th century. The archive is a result of the information that was collected by a social research organisation known as Mass Observation, that was founded in the late 1930s. Its aim was to conduct anthropological studies and analyse the everyday lives of ordinary people throughout Britain. The archive mainly consists of documents such as surveys, reports, and diaries that are highly insightful for understanding social history in the 20th century. The organisation continued on until the 1960s, but the project was later revived in 1981 by the University of Sussex.

IN the strenuous and trying days which face us all, countless owners of dogs and cats will get from their pets a measure of faithfulness and companionship which may well be a great comfort to them.

In this booklet we show how you can best care for the welfare of your dog or cat in wartime; and if we can help you on some particular problem of your own, and which is not covered in this book, we shall be very pleased to do so.

The National Archives (UK) Records of the Court of Requests 1492-1642

The Records of the Court of Requests, held at the National Archives (UK), are another key source for understanding the lives of ordinary British people during the late medieval and early modern period. Established in the 1480s, the court heard civil disputes and occasional criminal cases for those who were of lower status. Known as the ‘court of poor men’s causes’, it operated until 1642 but was not revived after the conclusion of the English Civil War. Court documents include materials related to cases regarding property, marriage contracts, inheritance issues, and land disputes. They are incredibly useful for discovering details about the lives of ordinary people from a period where information is very scarce.

Archivo Histórico Provincial de Cáceres (Spain) Protocolos Notariales de la provincia de Cáceres 1514/1988

Documents produced by regional notaries, such as those held at the Archivo Histórico Provincial de Cáceres, are an important means to understand Spanish grassroots history. Notaries have been established in Spain since the medieval period. This example is from the region of Cáceres and spans several hundred years. Local notaries were used to ratify legal decisions such as wills, dowry agreements, and deeds of sales. They are an important as they provide a reflection of the daily life in many municipalities and can even feature other information such as legal cases and auction records.
